

1. Upon reading Chapter 11, I did not understand their study exactly. If they were looking into minor group engagement with other minor groups and the topic of immigration, how would their interaction with each other be good or bad?
2. In the methodological approach from Chapter 11, I found it very interesting that they chose Philadelphia as the location for their research since they would have more accurate data if more than one group were in the exact location.
3. I like the way Marrow from the chapter says that, based on your topic, there are many different methods for approaching questions in your research survey.
4. Research takes time and can still be very hard, even if you're the most organized person. Things can change, like a group that doesn't participate in the research affecting your research and data.
5. New ways of known in chapter 11. It taught me that doing research and surveys for people to provide data for research opens your understanding of learning and builds new skills.
