

Adrienne Marie Brown's idea(s) in her text is that love for something makes people more passionate towards it. This means that if you are passionate about what you are doing, then that is great. Another main point is to take everyone as your teacher. This one is especially important because you do not know everything. Sometimes, people just need to learn from other people. This is a point that can tie into to reparative justice maps very well.

Edward Soja's idea(s) in her text is that there are three principles that spatial justice today "hinges" upon. There are many ways to search for justice, and some of these ways can be either beneficial or detrimental. All the space around us is what shapes relationships. Depending on where you are, you are bound to develop different relationships with diverse kinds of people.

Overall, both of these sources tell us a lot about places a systems. Again, based on where you are, you are bound to form several types of relationships. This also gives a sense of system and consistency with places in general.

All of this information could be used to group many types of places together if they help people form the same type of relationships with others.
