Reflection#4

In my recent conversations with my professors, I have come to terms with what I am finishing for my semester. A lot of hard work has been put in, and my group has been putting dedication into their assignment. When talking to my research team, they help us get an understanding of what we are doing to finish off the semester. There have been many challenges and a lot of editing, trying to get the emplacement plan into better standing.

Meeting with the community partners, they gave a lot of good feedback on how to finish off the website. The editing and adding of captions for the different sections of the assignment. The mentors help give feedback on the little tweaks that could improve our finishing touches on the assignment. Some examples were talking about keeping up with pantries and different stores in the area with fresh produce. We are also looking into the housing problem and the different strategies to help them understand their homeowner rights. My part gave a testimony of the struggles of living in these areas firsthand. There was nothing pleasant about dealing with flooding and the problems it came with.

I feel that I am still growing every day and still putting in the effort to finish off strong with my team. We had hardships and even personal things that we had to deal with, but we finished off strong. I want to keep doing this type of work and hope one day we can make a change. I am grateful for the community partners and my research team. The effort of everyone put in to spread awareness of the problems in these low income neighborhoods. I am glad to see so many other people who care about these problems.
